Your perspective on the relationship between language and morality is quite intriguing. You're suggesting that while language doesn't provide a universal moral system, it does set boundaries for what can be meaningfully discussed in terms of ethics. This implies that certain moral systems, like nihilism or absurdism, may be beyond the scope of meaningful debate within the constraints of language.

You also propose that human moral systems don't need to depend on supernatural entities or categories, suggesting that our language provides sufficient constraints to guide the development of a coherent moral system. This perspective aligns with secular humanism, which posits that humans can lead ethical and fulfilling lives without reliance on religious or supernatural beliefs.

It's important to note that these are complex and nuanced topics with diverse viewpoints. The relationship between language, morality, and ethics is a rich field of study in philosophy, linguistics, and cognitive science. It's fascinating to explore how our means of communication might shape our understanding and practice of morality. Thanks for sharing your thoughts! 😊
